Help communities, students, clients, and employers connect with a broader audience, expand access to knowledge, and succeed in a global information society.

It goes without saying that you want a job after investing so much time and money into your college degree. You don't have to look far (Forbes, New York Times, Monster.com) to find stories about the value of clear, compelling, and concise writing in professions such as law, medicine, education, or engineering.

We pay attention to what employers want, and we're always developing new courses to keep up with changing times. Check out our course offerings at: <http://sites.gsu.edu/rhetcomp/currentcourses!>

Learn to use innovative technology to create beautiful, well-crafted, and reliable content for print, web, and social media.

We live in exciting times when it comes to writing and technology. That's why so many of our classes provide you with opportunities to gain both traditional and digital writing skills.

But don't worry. We don't expect you to arrive at GSU already knowing how to do content management, web design, or multimedia production.

When we say you learn by doing in rhetoric and composition, we mean it.

Sharpen and refine your critical thinking and writing skills while focusing on contemporary social issues.

People say all the time that what happens in the college classroom isn't applicable to the "real" world. We don't agree.

A degree in rhetoric and composition begins and ends with using writing to affect change in your community—in the world, now. Many of our courses in digital publishing, food and travel writing, and the history of rhetoric and literacy provide opportunities for service learning and internships while also addressing issues such as climate change, urban poverty, and education inequality.
